One can conceive the effect of this revelation upon Gutenberg s sensitive mind, and when the truth of his narrow affairs at the hearthstone, of his expenditures, of his delays, of his efforts, and of the failures to obtain support from his endeavors, is realized, one can find one s own thought concurring with the imaginations of the distinguished author of Dresden, Gustave Nieritz, whose gentle Saxon heart came in such close and harmonious relation with that of Gutenberg, although they were separated from each other by hundreds of years. The great ever are contemporaries. Their friendship is eternal, like the fame of their accomplishments. And Nieritz and Gutenberg, in their solicitude concerning the establishment of the art preservative of all arts, and the truthful rendition of the enchanting story to succeeding ages, are one. So, let us listen to Nieritz for a moment, as he tells of the culmination of the long search: It was with utmost eagerness that Gutenberg set himself at work. From a block of some hard wood he severed numerous little strips, of a few inches in length, and exceedingly narrow. On an end of each of these he shaped a letter, which stood out from the wood in bold relief, and through the other end he bored a small hole. Thus, having become supplied with letters in considerable quantity, including all which comprise the alphabet, he laid them beside each...
